

Teen Vogue's Amanda Chan Joins Bustle As Managing Editor

Bustle's Lindsay Mannering promoted to Vice President, Editorial Strategy, Bustle Digital Group

New York, NY — October 10, 2017— Bustle, the largest independent media property for millennial women, reaching an audience of 50 million uniques a month, announced today that Amanda Chan will join Bustle as Managing Editor, effective October 10. Chan will oversee Bustle's editorial direction across its many verticals, lead a team of 30 editors and more than 200 writers, and create high-impact content packages and initiatives for the brand. In addition to welcoming Chan, Bustle Digital Group has promoted Lindsay Mannering — the former Managing Editor of Bustle — to Vice President of Editorial Strategy for Bustle Digital Group.

"It's easy to be impressed with Amanda's breadth of experience over the years, but it's even easier to be impressed with the passion she has for providing a platform for women," said Bustle Editor-in-Chief Kate Ward. "We're beyond excited to be able to welcome Amanda onto our team, and watch her creativity and editorial knowledge elevate our content to an even higher level."

"I'm a huge admirer of Bustle's approach to covering the news and topics that are so central to women's lives," said Amanda Chan. "I'm grateful to be joining a talented team of journalists who are doing exciting, engaging work every day."

Prior to joining Bustle, Chan was the digital deputy editor at Teen Vogue, where she oversaw the daily operations of TeenVogue.com. Previously, she held roles as deputy editor of Yahoo Health, Healthy Living managing editor at HuffPost, and a reporter at MyHealthNewsDaily (now LiveScience Health). Chan holds a bachelor's degree in journalism from the Walter Cronkite School of Journalism and Mass Communication at Arizona State University and a master's degree in journalism from the Columbia University Graduate School of Journalism.

###